How to encourage young learners to strive to achieve

Caroline Nixon

Implanting teaching techniques to create a learning environment in which pupils can push the limits of language acquisition and go further with English.

Through collaborative learning, and by setting clear, obtainable objectives that pupils can use to map out and chart their own progress, we can encourage them to become active participants in their own 'learning journey'.

The talk will draw on areas of Power Up to illustrate aspects of life skills, emotional intelligence, teamwork, learner autonomy and language assessment.

Motivating teenage learners

11.00 – 12.00

Matthew Elliman

Teenagers can be the most challenging age group to teach, but when things go well they can also be the most rewarding. In this workshop we'll examine the types of activities that will help to keep your teenage learners engaged, using examples from Think.

Support, challenge, choice
in our classrooms

13.30 – 14.30

To help learners achieve success and take responsibility for their language learning, we need to ensure that content and activities are relevant, accessible and suitably challenging to involve everyone in the group. In this session, we'll consider some different ways of doing this.

Break

14.30 – 14.50

Grammar teaching:
flipping back to the future

14.50 – 16.20

Raymond Murphy & Matthew Ellman

The latter part of this session will be a Question & Answer session with Raymond Murphy, bestselling author of English Grammar in Use, among many other titles.

The first edition of English Grammar in Use offered students in the 1980s something revolutionary: materials specifically designed to help them learn and practise new grammar structures outside the classroom, so that they could spend the valuable time in class more effectively. In this session we'll see how this approach prefigured modern methodologies, and look at what teachers can do in the classroom to make the most of the learning their students bring to lessons.
